

About the Partnership

The T Level Professional Development Programme (TLPD) upskills individual leaders to create an internal coalition to deliver real change that supports institutional development and that benefits the entire Further Education and Skills sector for the good of its students and the wider ecosystem.

This pioneering initiative, delivered through a unique partnership between the Education and Training Foundation, King's College London and ChangeSchool, created an enduring community of change leaders across the English Further Education sector. The programme championed the successful rollout of T Levels while reshaping culture, collaboration, and leadership practices nationwide.

Education and Training Foundation (ETF) is the workforce development body for the Further Education and Skills sector. ETF works in partnership with others to design and deliver evidence-based professional learning and development for teachers, trainers and leaders to improve education and training for learners aged 14 and over.

King's College London is a research-intensive university that uses research to enhance teaching and executive education. Academics at King's Business School lead in their fields and are knowledgeable in strategy, leadership, and organisational change. Lead academics specialise in workplace purpose, behavioural insights, executive programme design, pedagogy, and digital technologies.

ChangeSchool brings practitioner delivery and curriculum design expertise to leverage extensive leadership knowledge and understanding of change management. ChangeSchool London is among the UK's fastest-growing international education institutions, offering programmes for executives and university faculty in 39 countries.
